

The Zoo School

By D.N.

An owl was a teacher at The Zoo School. He had many students: a hippo, a donkey, an elephant, a sloth, a horse and a sheep. They were all great friends and played together all the time. One day the owl has given them a group assignment. They had to organize a play and to perform it in front of the whole school. The elephant and the hippo were the actors, the sheep was the director, the donkey and the horse were the technical support and the sloth was the play organizer. It had started out great, but shortly it became a chaos.

The elephant was great at learning all the scripts and the hippo was a really good dancer. The horse was very hard-working, while the donkey was sleeping all the time and doing nothing. The sheep was complaining all the time and was trying to get the play done as quickly as possible. The organization of the play was not making much progress, because the sloth was very slow at everything and it took him a lot of time to organize the whole play.

The owl was watching the students all the time, and he wasn't very happy with how it was all going. Some of the animals complained to the teacher about them having to do all the work. The owl gave them a talk about their responsibilities and told them they had to be more productive or they would fail that school year. The hard-working animals made the lazy ones help them by telling them they would be very popular after the play, so they managed to finish the project.

In the end, the play went really well and they all passed. Some got better marks than the others, but they were all satisfied. They were all very happy that they had achieved something together as a team.
